MALPAS BARONY

Inquisitions in 1295 and 1298 after the death of Urian de Sancto Petro (Sanpierre) recorded that he held parts of the baronies of Malpas, Shipbrook and Wych Malbanc (Nantwich). So far as Malpas was concerned, Urian held one fourth part of the barony by right of Idonea late his wife, daughter and one of the heirs of David de Malo Passu (Malpas). In practical terms this amounted to a carucate of land in Malpas, one fourth part of the advowson of Malpas church, and a court of free tenants, 66s 5½d in rents, a fourth part of the serjeanty of the barony, £6 10s rent in Foulwich, and a fourth part of the manor of Cuddington, The whole amounted to 1½ knights' fees.

After Idonea's death Urian married Margaret, who brought a third part of the manor of Chorlton, and whose marriage, upon Urian's death, was immediately granted by the Crown to . . . Basset. She subsequently appears as the wife of Ralph Basset. Urian's heir was Urian son of John de Sancto Petro, son of Urian and Idonea, and then aged 16, bringing the property into ward.

On 10 December 1259 after the death of David de Malo Passu, a division was made of his property between his daughters, Idonea wife of Urian de Sancto Petro and Beatrix wife of William son of Robert Patrick: but Urian and Idonea objected to the division as being unfair. The justice referred to a record from the court from the time of Gilbert Talbot (q.v.; 1255–1257), but Urian and Idonea said that they had agreed to a reasonable division, and this was unreasonable. Moreover, they produced letters from John le Breton, the earl's seneschal, saying that a decision made by the earl in council should not be overthrown by the county court.

Isolda will have died and Urian remarried, to Margaret, by 1275:

De Banco 22 July 1275, Wycombe: William Salt vi i 68

Oxon. An assize, etc., if Roger Bishop of Coventry and Lychfeld, and Urian de St. Pierre and Margaret his wife had unjustly disseised William le Poure of his free tenement in Tackele, viz., of a messuage and a carucate of land.

The jury say that William had demised the tenement to the Bishop as security for a loan of 50 marks which the Bishop had paid to acquit him in judaismo, and that the Bishop had had seisin for three years, and the tenement was worth £20 yearly, and he had enfeoffed the said Urian and Margaret, and thus disinherited the said William of his lands. Urian and Margaret afterwards remit their claim, and the Bishop, who had been called to warranty by them, granted to them twenty librates of land in La Hyde and Brewode, and if the said value cannot be made up there then in other places in co. Stafford, m. 4.

Immediately after Urian's death in 1295, the ward of his grandson and heir Urian de Sancto Petro was granted by the Crown to John son of Reginald de Grey. In 1298 the young Urian sued Grey for the estates and an account of the profits since Grey had been granted ward.

In this process Malpas and the barony are not directly referred to, but the part inherited from David de Malo Passu through Idonea is described: the manor of Peckforton, a mill, half a mill in Beston, a fourth part of Foulwich manor, and one and a half saltpits in Wych Malbanc.

This brings us to the question of what happened to the other three quarters of Malpas barony.

David de Malo Passo occurs frequently as witness to the earl's charters (CAC 231 to 378) from about 1210 to 1220 and was certainly dead by 1259: as Isolda inherited a quarter of the barony, doubtless Beatrix also had one quarter, in which case David himself perhaps had one moiety.

Light on the matter may be shown by an action long after this period, in 1363 (Helsby i 600) between John Delves and Isabella his wife, plaintiffs, and John de Brunham junior, one of the trustees of John de Sancto Petro, as to a moiety of a fourth part of the barony of Malpas. Delves claimed that William son of David le Clerk died seised of this moiety in the reign of Henry III (1216-1272): William died without issue, and his right should have descended to his brother and heir Philip and then successively generation by generation to Philip, Philip, David, Philip and then David, whose sister Isabella (Delves) was his heir. However, the Sancto Petros and Burnhams had acquired the estate because Isolda and Beatrix were daughters of a David, son of William son of David le Clerk. For some reason the jury decided that David le Clerk was a bastard, depriving his issue of any inheritance.

In 1380 (Chester 29/83 m.2) a further case was brought ²¹ in which it was declared that Idonea and Beatrix were the two daughters and heirs of David de Malo Passu, who inherited his property (a fourth part of the manor or barony of Malpas) from his father William: William and Philip were the two sons of David le Clerk. The suit was brought against Isabella wife of Walter de Cokesey, Isabella being daughter and heir of Urian de Sancto Petro the grandson. The jury somehow came to a decision that David de Malo Passo, Isabella de Cokesey's great-great-grandfather was a bastard, invalidating his and thereby her claim to the fourth part of Malpas barony, which should have been inherited by David's uncle Philip; then by his son David de Malpas; then by his son Philip; then by his son David; then by his son Philip, who had two daughters, Isabella (wife of John de Delves) and Elena (wife of William de Brereton).

A slightly different story is told in the Egerton pedigree drawn up by Randle Holme in 1690 and treasured by the Egertons:²²

Gules three pheons argent, impaling argent a chevron sable between three wrens gules.

Two halves of Malpas barony are now mentioned: one held by William le Belward in 1111-1112, the other held by Ralph ap Eignon and acquired by David le Clerc by his marriage to Margaret coheir (and presumably one of two daughters) of ap Eignon.

The early county court records have one clash between the Egertons and the Sancto Petros, but without reference to the barony. Philip de Egerton sued Katherine who was wife of John de Sancto Petro, Roger son of Thomas de Dutton and Nicholas his lad for having on Thursday 25 September 1292 seized two axes of his in the township of Bickley in a certain place called Turnendpool, and kept them until they were recovered for him by the royal bailiff. Katherine answered that the axes had been being used to cut her trees in Bickley wood. Philip claimed that he had every right to cut down branches and trees in the wood for housebote and haybote, i.e. for repairing houses and hedges. Katherine said that Philip's house was in Egerton, and he had no right to take wood from Bickley (Bickley adjoins Egerton on the south); that the townships of Egerton and Bickley did not share right of common in Bickley wood. Philip said that in the time of John de Sancto Petro he had been accustomed to take estover in Bickley wood: this Katherine denied.
